

Working & Living Authentically in 2017

If you are at the stage where you are looking to re-assess your life and or career, this is a wonderful post on LinkedIn, The 5 Biggest Regrets People Have Before They Die

While the title sounds somewhat morbid, it is actually a poignant article based on the experience of someone caring for terminally ill people. They recount the regrets that people have about various aspects of their lives – be it relationships, love, leisure, work.....

Interestingly, it also looks at all those things that hold people back from doing what they really wanted to be doing with their lives– which is often sadly the expectations and opinions of others!

The article serves to force us to reflect on what is truly important to us, and how we want to live our lives.

How do you truly want to live 2017 and beyond? Is it time to chart your own course?

What will 'the workshop of yourself' be?

Today I took the time to slowly and indulgently read through an article that has been lying around the house since the weekend. I knew it was going to be a special article that I would want to take in without distraction. The article is

'What Trent Dalton heard in GoMA's golden chair' published in The Weekend Australia,

This is a wonderful article that makes you reflect on who you are, your life and your purpose. Or as the writer Mr David Malouf calls it "The workshop of yourself". It also makes you think about those key relationships in your life. Are they being tended? Are you giving them time?

I cannot recommend this article enough for those curious about life and keen to be inspired and to learn some wonderful lessons.

For those interested in some self – reflection work around their purpose, you can download some complimentary guides to get you started.

How to Write Your Career Vision & Mission Statement

You would be hard pressed to find a company that does not have some form of vision and/or mission statement that is publicly accessible. Companies are mixed, in that not all distinguish between the two. Google has one statement that they use interchangeably, which is “to organize all of the data in the world and make it accessible for everyone in a useful way“. While Ikea’s vision statement is –“At IKEA our vision is to create a better everyday life for the many people. Our business idea supports this vision by offering a wide range of well-designed, functional home furnishing products at prices so low that as many people as possible will be able to afford them.”

Whether you’re an employee or self-employed, it makes sense to have your own career related vision and/or mission statements. These build upon your core values and help define more clearly to you, and others, what is meaningful in your career. Jennell Evans has written a great article, ‘Vision and Mission – What’s the difference and why does it matter?’ While the article is written for organisations, the same fundamentals apply to us as individuals. If you think about it, you are the organisation. You market yourself and sell your time and expertise in return for money.

Vision Statement

To assist in starting to create your vision statement, allow yourself time to reflect and imagine your ideal career and lifestyle 5-10 years from now. What would it look like? What kind of skills would you be using? With what types of people would you be working? How many hours per week? Where would you be based? Keep dreaming some more.....

If you need more help with your vision, see 'The Power of Career Visioning: A How To Video & Steps'

The Career Vision Statement

In simple terms, the vision statement is created around the future state of what the entity (organisation or person) is working towards achieving over 5 – 10 years. It is written in a way that is inspirational and that can easily be understood and lived.

▪ Example: Career Vision Statement

“Empowering people globally to experience happiness & purpose in their workdays.”

Mission Statement

The mission statement is written in the here and now, and outlines the purpose of the organisation / entity. It has a short-term focus (1- 4 years) and is written in a succinct manner, so it can be easily recalled. It should support the vision statement.

Borrowing from Jennell Evans article, 'Vision and Mission – What's the difference and why does it matter?' the mission statement needs to answer 3 key questions;

- WHAT it does;
- WHO it does it for; and
- HOW it does what it does

Example: Career Mission Statement

What: Deliver virtual coaching and digital career and lifestyle related resources

Who: People across the globe wanting to feel more empowered in their work and experience an increased sense of happiness and purpose.

How: Exceptional client service, innovation, listening focussed!

“Leader in virtual coaching & digital resources that empower people across the globe to experience greater happiness & purpose in their workdays. Innovative, client focused, ensuring people are heard.”

While you may not feel the need right now to craft your vision and / or mission statement, if you are feeling as though your career is drifting or are contemplating making some career changes, it can be a valuable exercise for creating clarity.

You may like to create your vision & mission statement using pen & paper, PowerPoint, Excel, Pinterest or any medium that works best for you. In an age of ‘Brand You’ it makes sense to be thinking of ourselves and our careers in a more marketing savvy way.

September Events for Women

Looking to Negotiate Their Salary Packages!

Equal Pay Day for Women in Australia is held on Thursday 8th September.

During September I am running Salary Negotiation Events & Webinars for women looking to develop their skills in this area. Why? Because the pay gap is sadly nearing 18%. The gap only increases the more senior the role you hold, upwards of 20%.

Breakfast Event: NAB Village, Melbourne, 8th September (limited spaces)

'How to Successfully Negotiate Your Next Salary Package Increase & Earn An Additional $700K+ Over Your Career!'

If you haven't negotiated your salary package lately or ever – then this presentation held on Equal Pay Day for Women is a must attend.

If you want to be working smarter and increasing your earning capacity at the same time, this presentation will equip you with the tools and confidence to do so.

Some of the reasons why women resist engaging in salary negotiation and career promotion conversations include; our different personality types, social conditioning, overvaluing competency, over-thinking the process, lack of confidence and simply failing to act. Without acting nothing will change.

Come along to an informal and interactive session with Kelly Magowan, author of The Busy Women's Guide to... Salary Negotiation to learn about how to improve your negotiation skills with both current &/or future employers. In the session we will share salary negotiation stories and ask the key questions around this topic that too many of us shy away from.

The presentation will cover topics such as:

- Why Negotiate?
- Combating Negotiation Fears
- The Work / Salary Challenges Women Face
- The Fundamentals of Salary Negotiation
- How to Determine Your Worth in the marketplace
- What Is Negotiable
- How to Conduct the Salary Negotiation Process
- Legal Do's & Don't's of Employment Contracts

Women & Confidence! How to Get More of the Good Stuff!

Throughout my career as a coach, there is an ongoing theme when working with women – which comes back to a lack of confidence.

While there is a string of reasons why this is the case – most of which we are all familiar with;

- Conscious & Un-Conscious Bias
- Society & Cultural Norms
- Over Personalising Set Backs
- Personality Traits
- Personality Type
- Perfectionism
- Under estimating our abilities
- And so on.....

It is so great to read an article with some lovely practical suggestions to help build women's confidence in an entertaining fashion. The article by Julia Baird is titled 'Why you should carry yourself with the confidence of a mediocre white man ' and is one that all women lacking in confidence should read. It is well worth the time.

Julia Baird writes about knowing your values to help ground you (something I am a strong advocate of for men & women to be aware of). If you are not sure what yours are, you can do a complimentary values exercise on my blog, 'How To Define & Live Your Values'

Having clarity of your core values forms part of the foundation of who you are and helps in building self-confidence. In the article there is a wonderful suggestion for when your confidence is lacking particularly when speaking or appearing somewhere:

- Ask yourself, who are you
- Why you are there,
- What you stand for. Then speak from that place.

There are some great tools and resources about to assist in growing your self-confidence from Ted Talks such as that by Amy Cuddy on 'Power Posing', through to 'The Confidence Code' book by Claire Shipman & Katty Kay. In addition many coaches, counsellors and psychologists work with clients around building confidence.

Six ways to find out if you have a 'good job'!

So what is a good job? There are the somewhat antiquated views that still pervade that a good job is one with a flash title and pays well. However, you and I know that there are a lot of people who fit the profile of having a 'good job' who are not overly happy going to work each day to pursue this so called 'good job'.

In reality, what constitutes a good job is subjective. This seems too often be forgotten.

It is common for us all too unconsciously refer to some jobs as being good or bad that friends, family or colleagues hold, without understanding what they involve and the sense of satisfaction people attain from different work pursuits.

Unfortunately, the fear of what others think (status anxiety) can keep people in jobs and careers that make them desperately unhappy. Even though we work in era where new career paths and jobs are constantly emerging, unfortunately many of the traditional views around job titles and status linger!

What we need to remind ourselves to do, is to set aside what others think and say. That we are the only ones who can determine what a good job is for us.

Six ways to help determine if your job is good!

1. Do you get a kick out of the work you do (on most days at least)?
2. Do you like the folks you work with?
3. Are you challenged on a regular basis?
4. When you reflect on what you do, does it give you some sense of satisfaction or tie in with your purpose?
5. Are most of your key values met?
6. Does it pay the bills?

You will notice that all of the above relate to how you experience your work and the workplace. None of these have anything to do with your job title, profession, the money you earn or where your work is based. There is nothing here about status. It is largely inwardly focused.

So while we are still conditioned to think of a 'good job' in the traditional sense of the term, the reality is that a good job is the one that makes you happy.

How To Define & Live Your Values

“There is no passion to be found in playing small—in settling for a life that is less than you are capable of living.” –

Nelson Mandela –

Our values make us who we are. They are developed over time in the interactions we experience. It is important for you to understand your values as they act as internal guides to the things you do and say.

The majority of people have never sat down and thought about or documented what their values are. If you are unsure about your key values, I encourage you to review the extensive list of values below to assist in determining what they truly are. If there are values missing from this list, add these to the bottom blank section and treat them as a part of the two exercises below.

It is important to be aware of the values that are meaningful to us. If we know what we value, we are better positioned to think about what industries, types of jobs and companies we may be most suited to. Or whether or not we want to work for ourselves. It will also help to identify those values that we want to avoid in our career and life.

Career Changes & Fear – Where Is It Really Coming From?

As humans, we can be sceptical about new things as we assume it can negatively impact our lives. For most of us, change represents different degrees of 'fear'. Fear is a double-edged sword, while it can guarantee our safety, it can also lead to us missing out on wonderful life experiences. This is certainly true when it comes to our work lives.

Throughout my work as a careers professional, for nearly all the clients I have worked with, the topic of 'fear' in its different guises has arisen. This fear has led to them staying in jobs and career paths that provide little satisfaction beyond the pay.

According to my experience, fear can be;

- Fear of the unknown
- Fear of what others will think
- Fear of loss of status
- Fear of loss of income
- Fear of wasted education
- Fear of failure
- Fear of success
- And the list goes on.....

Another area of 'fear' in the careers context is other's 'projecting' their 'fear' onto those who looking to;

- Take a career break
- Change careers
- Engage in further study
- Start their own business
- Create a portfolio career

It is not uncommon for people looking to make career changes, to find those around them (friends, family, colleagues) less supportive than they would have imagined about their career choices. There are certainly many reasons why others do this, however their comments are more often than not based around their own 'fears' which they project onto the person looking to make changes.

For example, a son who is taking a career break, may find his parents 'acting' supportive in some ways, while they also make unsettling comments around the length of time he has been unemployed and the impact it will have on him ever securing another 'good' job. He may also find his friends and colleagues questioning his decision to take a career break for such an extended period of time and what this will do to his career.

The son, while initially feeling reasonably confident about his decision becomes increasingly uncertain. Even though he has a plan behind the career break.

In this case, the parents fear is coming from a place of parental concern about their child. From a desire to protect them. Or, it may come from a fear of what others will say if their son has a lower status career or is unemployed for a lengthy stretch of time.

The comments from friends and colleagues could be coming from their own fears, which they are projecting. It could be their anxiety levels if they did not have secure employment or what others would think if they were not working. Or it could be genuine concern for their friends / colleagues welfare. They could also be coming from a place of jealousy, in that while they are not happy in their career, they don't have the money or confidence to take a career break and potentially make a career transition.

It is normal to have fears around making major changes in our work lives. What we don't expect when we decide to make changes, is how much the comments of others who doubt and question us, make us question our decisions.

On the topic of career breaks, they are very common these days for all manner of reasons – travel, study, family and a desire to simply take an extended break to recharge. Which makes sense given how hard and long most people work.

When making any changes in your work life be sure to spend some time reflecting and understanding your own fears. Also, be mindful to monitor the comments of those around you – friends, family and colleagues. Don't take on board their 'fears', instead focus on strategies to overcome yours.

How To Identify The Blockers That Are Stopping You Achieving Your Dreams

Most of us are afraid when it comes to embarking on a new career path, setting up a new venture or following our creative side – whether for pure pleasure or financial gain.

We all have blockers, with some version of fear underlying them all. (see activity below)

In this 30 minute video with Elizabeth Gilbert and Marie Forleo you will find great stories and tips to give you confidence and inspiration to sit more comfortably with your fear and pursue your dreams regardless.

My greatest take-away from the video (there are many) is that finishing something, even if it is just OK is always better than not finishing anything!
